“ Scott, as I write this, the year is 2022. It's December, the 28th, 9:41a. It's been 9, almost 10 years. I don't know how these memory things are supposed to work. If I'm supposed to talk to your parents or just about you in general.

I remember telling you about my condition. What it did to my behavior and how it altered my perceptions. I remember how ready I was, to lose a friend before I even had one.

"That just makes me want to hang out with you more."

Even now it takes me aback. That someone could with, you wanted to hang out with me more... what a weirdo, I thought. I hope that he stays.

I remember how miserable I was, all the time. The crushing weight of so many expectations. In reference to one of those many expectations I whimpered out,

"Well I can't just not go."

"Yes you can. You can just not go. You're 18."

Then you skipped school that April 20th. I didn't because I didn't want to do it alone. And I assumed you weren't serious.

Scott, you were the first person to both tell and treat me like I was a person with thoughts and feelings and opinions.

And you helped me understand that I

Am

A person.

I do matter.

And there is room for someone like me in the world.

I promise, that as long as I'm alive, you will be too. We give parts of our self when we interact with one another.

What I gained from you,

Scott, my best friend,

Is more precious than anything this physical world could produce.

I go by Ryan now. But it's all the same when I say,

My name is Paul Ryan Olguin and I am a person and I matter and there is room for someone like me in the world. That is what my best friend taught me.

I love you so so much Scott. So so much. You are my greatest treasure in this life. I will honor that as best I can. I promise.

“ Les,

I cannot begin to imagine the pain you are experiencing with the loss of such a wonderful son. You are a great mom, a hard worker and great provider. Scottie has truly been blessed to have you in his life, and you were very blessed to have him in your life, even for such a short amount of time.

My heart aches for you, Joe and Josh. Stay strong, and hold his memory close so you can always cherish the time you had together.

I love you,

Bobby Irvin
